A realization of the height, depth and distance, in other words, "the perspective," is almost an impossible impression upon the mind, as a result of seeing pictures of such wonders as the Grand Canon of the Yellowstone. Those unaccustomed to sights so deep, so high, so far, so beautiful, yet so awful, can hardly believe that the picture here represented attempts to portray a chasm five times as deep as the height of Washington Monument, where the roaring torrent river at the bottom is so far away not a ripple can be heard; where one tower of rock after another seems in strife to excel, not only in size and height, but in color as well. Surely the walls of the new Jerusalem must have been quarried here; all twelve of the sacred stones of the Revelation are here and side by side, and as the noon-day sunbeams dance between their glistening sides one almost imagines this to be the gateway to Heaven; and while in wonder, lost with all the dazzling beauty, amid such dizzy heights and depths, the eye is drawn, as if by a magnet, to the great waterfall a few miles in the distance, white with crystal spray made glorious by a thousand rainbows. Could it be the "Great White Throne?" Words are too feeble to express one's feelings when sights like this are revealed.
